Balconies and Rooftops

Balconies and Rooftops

Depending on how your home is designed, walking out a door at ground level isn't always convenient. Balconies have been around for centuries to offer those dwelling above the frost line an easy out to the fresh air. Today's homes are often equipped with raised decks and verandas that serve the same purpose – making it easy to transport a piping hot meal to a table situated al fresco, or for someone just arising from slumber to slip outside and test the air.

For city dwellers, an above ground surface may offer their only opportunity to create a living space outdoors. Rooftops and balconies double as nature retreats for the concrete clad urbanite, a chance to grow container gardens and strain for a note of distant birdsong.

Practicality aside, what could be better than a bird's-eye perch among the tree-tops? It's the outdoors with a much loftier perspective.

Gauzy curtains and French doors open to reveal a spacious balcony, formally furnished in cappuccino colored wicker and upholstery designed to withstand the elements. Pergola

Pergola

Besides being decorative, vines like the ones growing up the pergola and on the side of the house serve to add a feeling of age and dignity to a newer patio. Courtesy of Park Slope Design

Temporary Structures

Frequently found in parks and other public places, gazebos fit equally as well in private spaces like backyards and gardens. Here a gazebo becomes a backyard retreat furnished with curling cast iron furniture. The curtains can be adjusted for privacy or shade. Courtesy of Laneventure

Elements That Create a “Room”

The whole point of being outside isn't to be “in” a room. However, there are times when the great outdoors is more enjoyable when broken into “room-like” spaces. A certain comfort level can be obtained by carving out an area conducive to conversation, digestion, or simple relaxation. Humans tend to congregate in carefully defined places, and the backyard is no exception. Though this entire book is dedicated to the idea of outdoor rooms, this chapter, in particular, draws attention to smaller, non-architectural details that help make us feel “at home” outdoors.

Walls

Whether a half wall that affords seating or a tall wall that intentionally obscures the view, mankind has been creating solid barriers outdoors for as long as anyone has called themselves a “landscape designer.”
